Rebuilding this apartment into a stylish bachelor pad was an interesting and very successful undertaking for Davrob Construction.

Cottesloe

Davrob Construction were in the throes of completing an external upgrade to an ageing apartment complex in Cottesloe when they were approached by one of the residents who asked them to renovate his property within the complex.

Initially, the client had to contact all the other residents of the 16 apartments in the complex to gain approval to carry out such extensive renovations.

Then the two-storey apartment was completely stripped down to slab level before undergoing an entire rebuild.

The floorplan endured an extreme overhaul to transform the apartment into the most spacious, upmarket bachelor pad possible.

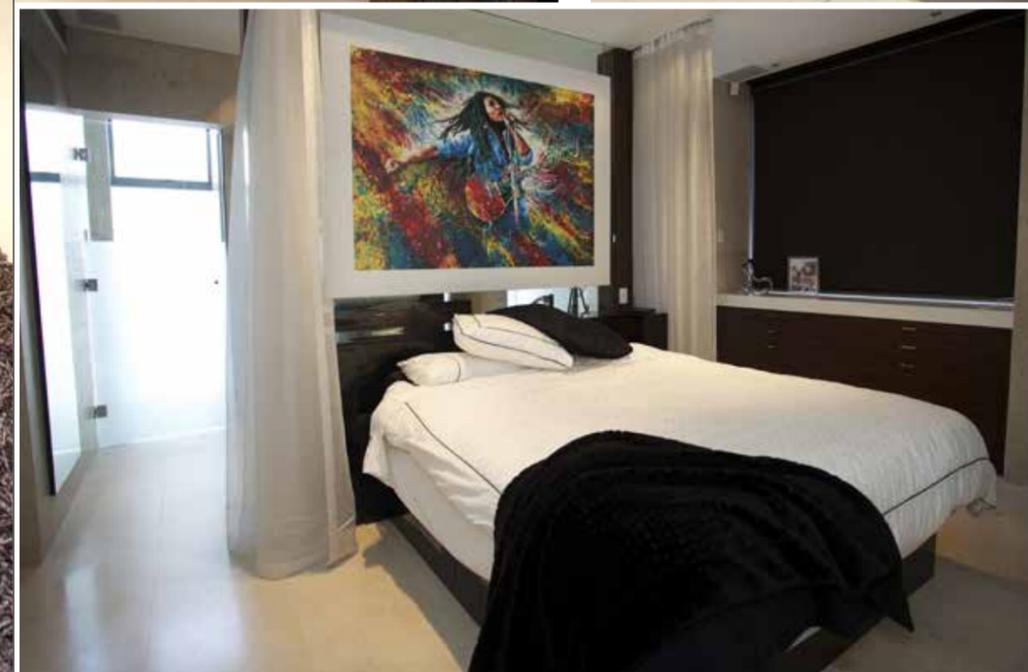

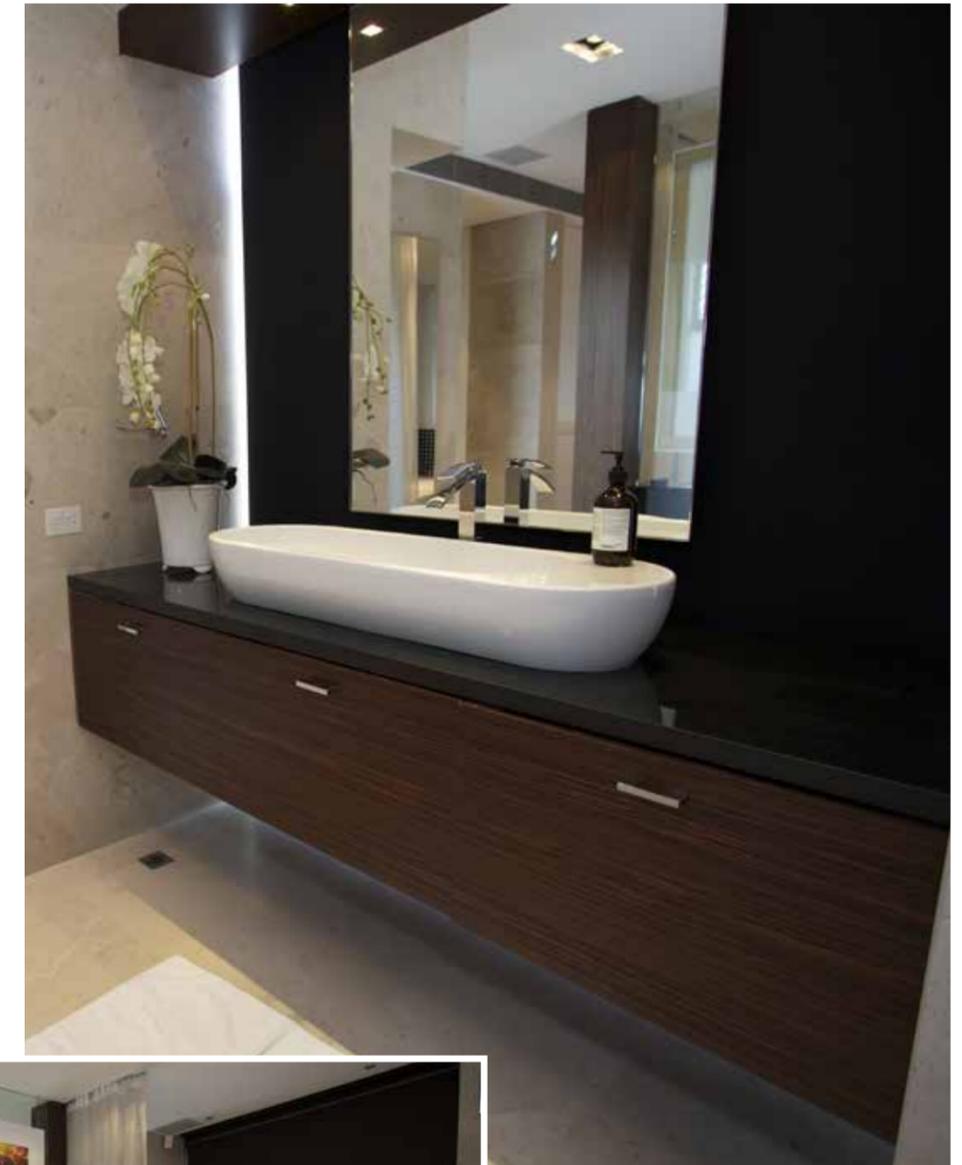

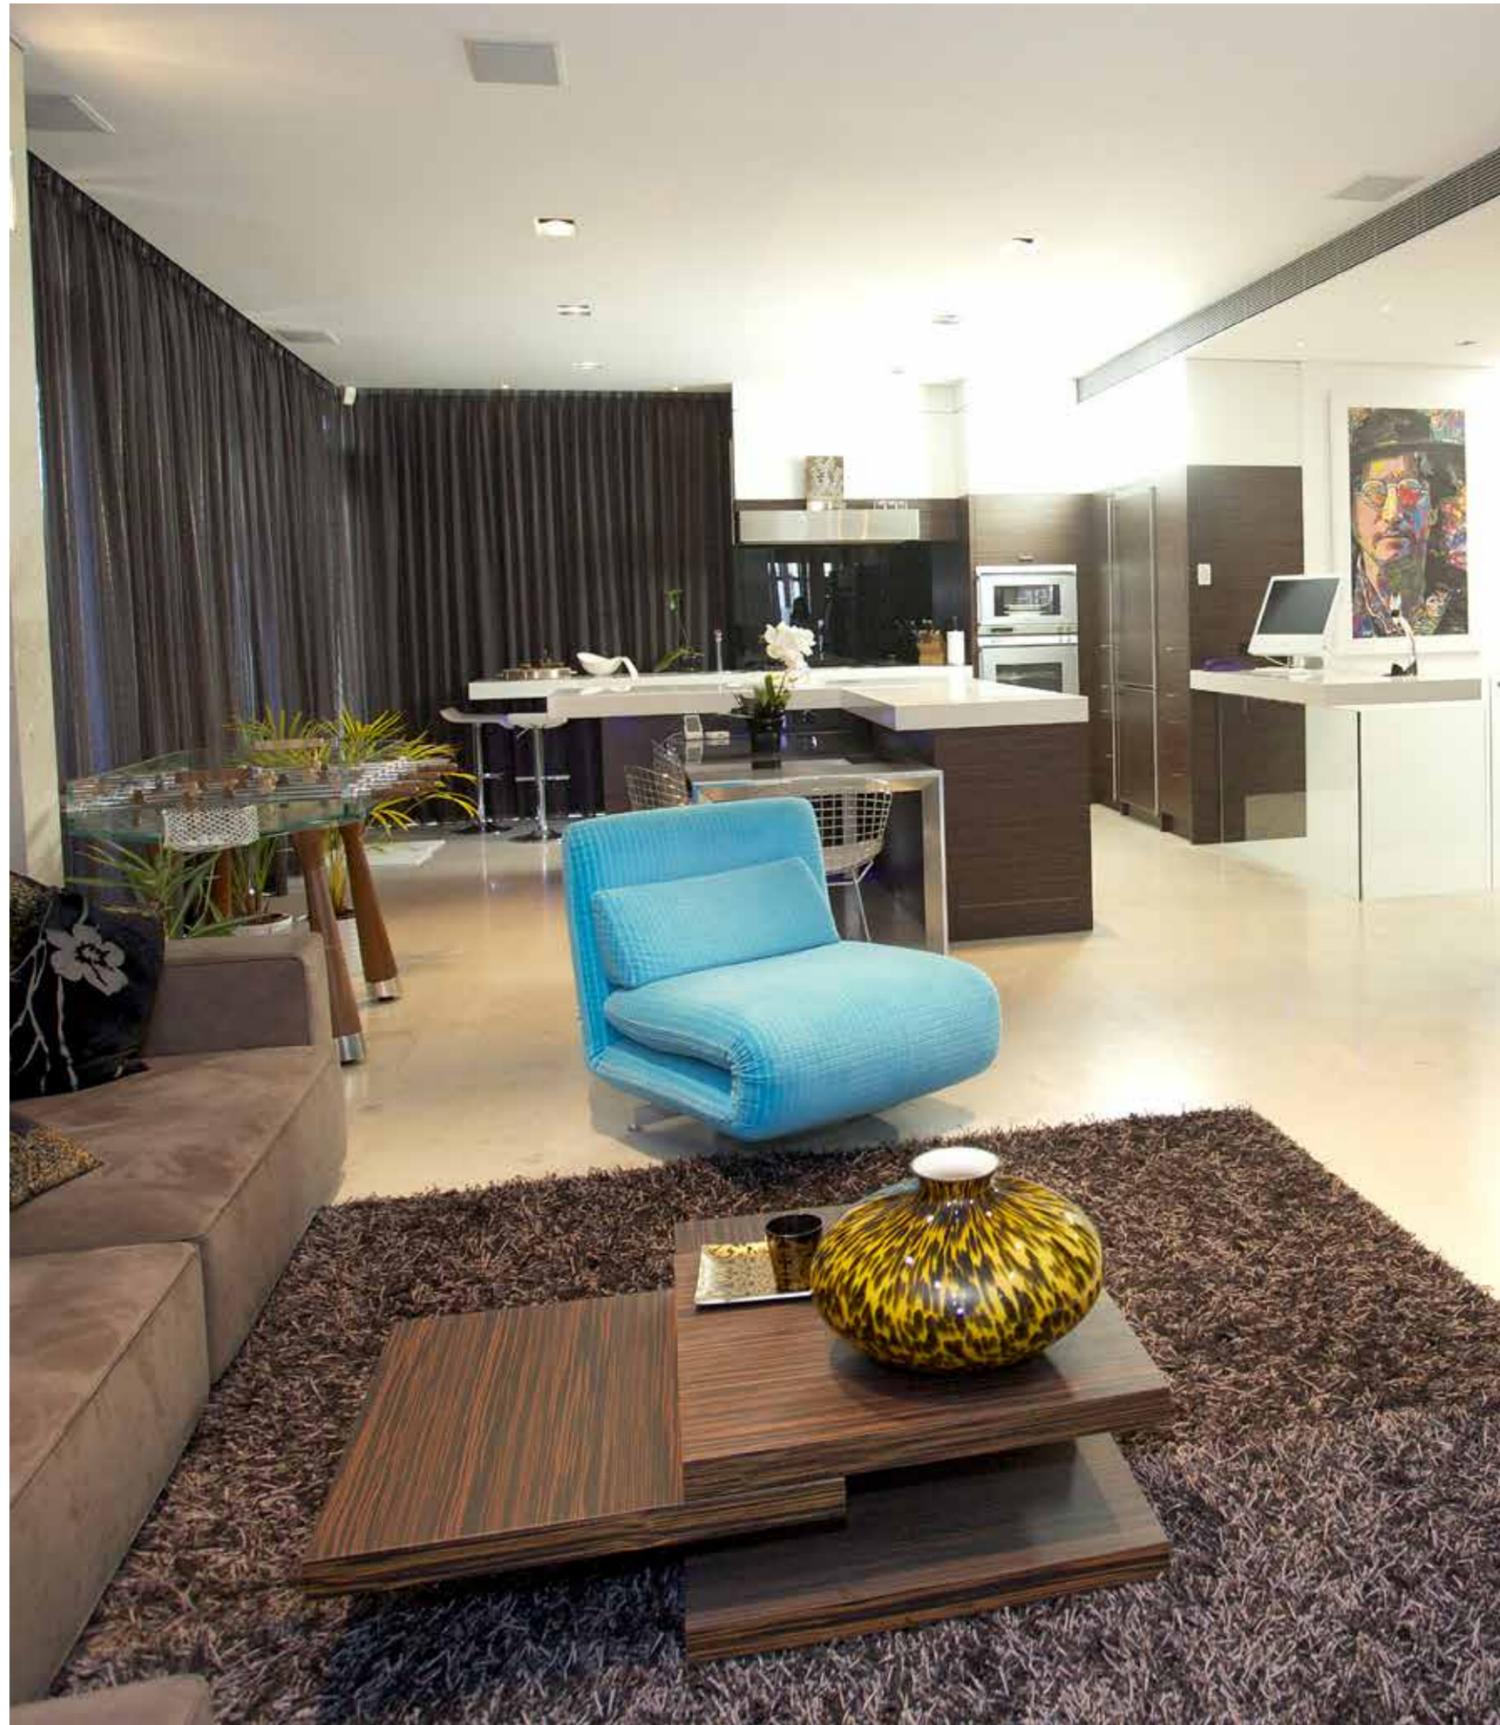

The new interior layout was designed to echo masculine sophistication.

Framed by glass walls, the voyeuristic master bedroom is visible from the living areas but also maximises the apartment's space. Similarly, the open ensuite connects effortlessly from the master bedroom, further exploiting use of space.

The small, poky rooms of the original unit were replaced with open-plan living areas that flow through to the balcony via glass stacker doors, complemented by cedar eaves. This further extended the amount of usable space while taking advantage of the spectacular ocean views.

Pushing beyond the typical style of a bachelor pad apartment, nothing has been forgotten in the final touches and finishes in this property.

Gaggenau appliances and Caesarstone benchtops with lacquered veneer cabinetry adorn the functional yet stylish kitchen, while the floors throughout the apartment are Italian limestone tiles with a honed finish.

A McIntosh sound system has been wired into the living areas, and integrated bar fridges mean the client is just an arm's length away from them while entertaining in the living area.

Finished with cedar and gunmetal-grey zinc cladding, the exterior stands out from the rest of the apartments yet blends naturally with the nearby ocean.
